I always knew my daughter was special. Every mother thinks her child is special but I knew. So special that the nurses in the baby clinic would crowd around to see her big and always blinking eyes. So special that she stayed awake all day and most of the night in order to observe the world … my child could attract a roomful of people to notice her.

But my daughter helped me overcome my inhibitions about being a public spectacle by throwing outrageous temper tantrums. She helped me become better acquainted with her pre-school teachers by challenging all those theories and systems ever created to make feel that any kind of hyperactivity in child can cause significant emotional, social and learning problems…………….

This snapshot is from a perplexed and frustrated mother describing a daughter with the baffling problem of an Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD).

Any child may show inattention, distractibility, impulsivity, or hyperactivity at times, but the child with ADD shows these symptoms and behaviours more frequently and severely than other children of the same age or developmental level. A research conducted by the author in schools in Delhi showed that ADD occurs in 6-7% of primary school age children and its prevalence is more in boys than in girls. ADD generally begins before the age of seven and it can continue into adulthood.

- Trouble paying attention
- Inattention to details and makes careless mistakes
- Easily distracted
- Loses school supplies, forgets to turn in homework
- Trouble finishing class work and homework
- Trouble listening
- Trouble following multiple adult commands
- Blurs out answers
- Impatience
• Fidgets or squirms
• Leaves seat and runs about or climbs excessively
• Seems “on the go or move always”
• Talks too much and has difficulty playing quietly
• Interrupts or intrudes on others.

Parents are distressed when they receive a note from school saying that their child “won’t listen to the teacher” or “causes trouble in class.” They recognize that their child’s behaviour is very different from that of other children around. Their extreme over-activity and inability to attend is apparent at home and school. But parents should learn ways of interacting with their child to become effective agents of change.

Some guidelines for the parents include:
Praise: Do not focus on the negative. Take the time to praise achievement and good behaviour.
Time: Spend quality time. Talk, do projects, play games or sports together.
Self-expression: Encourage your child to voice their opinions – from world affairs to classroom experiences. Listen to what they say.
